

The Interpreters of Foreign Languages Among the Ancients: A Study Based on Greek and Latin Sources (Classic Reprint)

The following dissertation on Interpreters was suggested by Professor Rolfe Sartelle Did Liscus Speak Latin? published in the Classical Journal, Vol. VII, pp. 126 sqq. It is a subject on which the handbooks and lexicons furnish very little information. The present investigation has been based on the Greek and Latin authors from the earliest times to Ammianus Marcellinus. The collection of the various incidents resulted in an array of examples of the most diverse nature, many of which have absolutely no relation to one another. To establish order out of chaos has proved to be a very difficult task, especially since it seems impossible to find a scheme of classification which is at the same time both logical and consistent. Some of the divisions naturally shade into one another and some of the examples could equally well be put under various headings. In such instances, the author has followed what appeared to him to be the most practical arrangement. Thus Chapters III and IV have much in common and might very properly be blended. But since Chapter III refers especially to polyglots, the acquisition of foreign languages, and the profession in general, it seemed better to make two chapters instead of one. The classification of the examples has been based primarily on the languages interpreted, and under the various linguistic headings a chronological order has been followed so far as possible. Fictitious incidents have been introduced before historical ones, but strict chronology could not always be followed ;sometimes it has been sacrificed for the sake of observing the linguistic attainments of a certain individual, or in other instances it has seemed better to treat together several incidents that took place in the same district.(Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and dont occur in the book.)About the Publisher Forgotten Books is a publisher of historical writings,
